RISKS ASSOCIATED WITH ASSAULT

The unarmed Security Guard is often exposed to the risk of assault from anti-social elements, unruly crowd or angry employees. However, we all have the right to self-defence. The right to self-defence is limited to situations where immediate threat of violence cannot be prevented by those authorised. The basic principle underlying the doctrine of the right to private defence is that when an individual or her/his property is faced with danger and an immediate aid from the State machinery is not readily available, the individual is entitled to protect oneself and one's property. But the force used by the person to protect self and property must not be grossly disproportionate to that needed to ward off the threat from the aggressor. Aggressors are grouped into five broad categories, namely, criminals, vandals, extremists, protest groups and terrorists. They can inflict injury or death on people; destroy or damage facilities, property, equipment or resources; steal equipment, material or information; and create adverse publicity. Acquiring training in unarmed self-defence techniques for dealing with hooligans, bullies, loafers, street fighters and the like enables the security guard to ward off an attack and protect self and others. Being an Unarmed Security Guard, it is important to assess the risk before deciding to engage with the aggressor.
