About the International Seminar

Climate change has emerged as one of the most pressing global challenges of the 21st century, influencing every sphere of human life and altering the balance between society and environment. Beyond its ecological consequences, climate change brings with it profound social, economic, cultural, and political transformations. Environmental sociology offers valuable insights into how communities, institutions, and policies respond to these transformations, and how pathways toward sustainability and resilience can be created.

This Two-Day International Seminar on "Climate Change and Social Transformation: Challenges and Pathways" aims to provide a multidisciplinary platform for scholars, researchers, policy makers, and activists to engage in critical discussions on the complex relationship between environmental change and societal structures. By focusing on the intersections of ecology, equity, and social justice, the seminar seeks to highlight the diverse challenges posed by climate change as well as explore innovative strategies, grassroots practices, and policy frameworks that can contribute to sustainable futures. The seminar will also foster international and interdisciplinary collaboration, encouraging participants to share theoretical perspectives, empirical research, and practical experiences from across the globe. Through panel discussions, paper presentations, and interactive sessions, the event aspires to generate new knowledge and actionable insights that can inform both academic discourse and real-world interventions.
