

Cookie Chef

Once upon a time, there was a selfish and stingy baker who owned a very prosperous bakery. Every night, he would rather throw away unsold pastries instead of gifting them to the poor and hungry.

One day, a baby pig begged the baker for one chocolate chip cookie. The baker rudely denied his simple wish. The pig was horrified by the baker's selfishness and was ruthlessly turned away! The pig became furious and cursed the baker: "Cookie by day and chef by night!" However, the transformation was incomplete after a rigorous fight.

During the day, the baker was a cookie so he couldn't work at all. During the night, the baker was in a cookie-like state with shortened hands and feet. His huge cookie-like tummy significantly affected his mobility and ability to make cookies, so he had to work extremely hard at night.

Worse, the baby pig came to eat almost all the cookies in revenge, especially hoping to eat the Cookie Chef as well! To avoid being eaten, the Cookie Chef made as many cookies as possible. He also made many trapdoors to hide during the day.

His only companion was his loyal oven! Whenever the pig got too close to his hiding spot, she would shoot fire to scare the pig away. As time passes, the baker realized the futility of being selfish. He realized the joy of sharing his bakeries with others rather than purely for the money.

He suddenly realized it was not important how much he had but with whom he shared with. It wasn't until he realized the joy of baking for others (even the poor) was the curse broken. To show his redemption, he even made a batch of cookies specially gifted to the pig.
