Critique The Critic

by
G.E. Graven

Can poems be coined merely for play in similar manner as in olden day or must they be butchered; dissected away by awful autopsy after poets' decay?

“What happened to us? We demand recourse!”
Should critical dissection be the only force that drives us poets to lay our course in some cryptic prescription even rivaling Morse?

“We must say, no!” There are no such things as puppet-like poems fitting critics' strings.

“QASHAB!”

All rhymes are rich by autonomous means,
and all verse is perfect when its poet sings.

We sing of spirits and dancing fairies, of wine and women and moment that varies
'tween whim and madness that surely carries with it some weight of worthy tally.

How dare you declare our words were wasted, proclaiming our pieces as merely pasted,
when effort was such that we poets tasted meaningful measures; preserved and unwasted.

Humble us now, oh Critical One,
Have you noted all prose we poets have done?
Comparing ourselves, you should certainly shun in light of the Poet, the Counter-Critical One.

How must we give birth, oh Demanding One,
that our free-form fancy be your dutiful son?
Is there such a rule that you are the one to raise our children? Your precision done?

We implore you Critic; critique this piece and wave your wand that it rest in peace.
“Abreq ad habra!” Cast it down as stain and crease ~
as a leaf of languishing language released.

When condemning this leaf, you do solemnly swear
by the blood of all poets ~ us everywhere, that all verse is worthless; all is despair
no matter the meter or genius we share.

“HARK!”

Since this is the poem where we poets do speak:
“We are neither your slaves, nor humble, nor meek,
but are lords of these worlds you contemptibly seek.
And your bounds are but ours to break and critique!”

<-Begin Analysis->

The theme of this poem revolves around the tension between artistic freedom and critical analysis. It critiques the idea that poems (or any art, really) must conform to the rigid expectations of critics or academic standards. Here's a breakdown of the key elements:

1. Rejection of Over-Analysis

The speaker challenges the notion that poetry must be "butchered" or dissected after the poet's death, like an autopsy. They suggest that poetry can, and perhaps should, be appreciated for its intrinsic creativity and beauty without needing to be analyzed to death. The idea of "cryptic prescriptions" and poems being reduced to mere formulas is criticized. This suggests that the poem's value is not merely in the academic analysis or deconstruction but in its ability to capture imagination and emotion.

2. Poetry as an Autonomous, Lively Force

The poem positions itself as alive and free, asserting that poetry isn't meant to be bound by critics' expectations or dissected for hidden meaning. There's an empowerment of the poet and a rejection of any external control over their art. The line "All rhymes are rich by autonomous means" implies that poetry doesn't need to conform to external standards to be valuable—it's complete in itself, rich in meaning and experience, whether or not it is understood in a conventional sense.

3. Poet vs. Critic

There's a direct confrontation between the poet and the critic. The critic is portrayed as rigid, demanding, and perhaps even dismissive of the creative process. In contrast, the poet's voice is confident, bold, and insists on creative freedom. The speaker questions why critics feel entitled to judge or dissect a poet's work, suggesting that their role might be misguided, even harmful.

4. Celebration of Creative Expression

The poem celebrates the spontaneity and freedom inherent in artistic expression. The whimsical references to spirits, fairies, wine, and whimsy reflect the joy and unpredictability of creativity. The "QASHAB!" and "Abreq ad habra!" can be seen as expressions of magical incantations, further emphasizing the playful, unrestrained nature of poetry, which is far from a mechanical or academic exercise.

5. The Poet's Sovereignty

The poem ends with the assertion that poets are "lords of these worlds"—they shape language and meaning, and their authority is above the critic's. The poet's creativity and vision are what give poetry its life, and any attempt to constrain or degrade that creativity is viewed as a direct challenge to the very nature of art.

Conclusion:

The poem can be seen as a manifesto for artistic independence, rejecting the traditional norms of critical analysis and emphasizing the freedom of the poet. It positions the poet as a creator of worlds who should not be bound by outside forces but rather allowed to express their vision without fear of dissection or condemnation. It's a bold defense of artistic autonomy and a critique of the sometimes restrictive nature of academic and critical discourse.
