Montana in the United States is home to endless beautiful lakes. It is famous for its all-embracing, deep-seated and nationwide obsession with trout. Any kind of connection, however slight, to trout, will be of interest here. The signs of this fanaticism with the fish are obvious as soon as you arrive. The state's largest airport is festooned with pictures of trout and there are notices with suggestions on where you might find them. It is also filled with planeloads of city dwellers decked out in cowboy attire, carrying exorbitantly priced trout-catching equipment. However, it is only when you start talking to the locals that the extent of the trout mania becomes apparent. Their passion is evident when you see young boys, no older than five, discussing with great wisdom and seriousness the merits of various fishing techniques. Montana and trout are inseparable.

Put up A COMMENT on the FAMILY TECHFEST NOTICE BOARD at the Information booth for a free GOODIE BAG!

☆ Post by 3 pm on 20 Sep

We find it both fun and convenient to just walk around the Family Techfest going from booth to booth to look at all the available options. Best of all, we feel that we are the ones being catered to and that we are under no pressure from those manning the booths to buy their products!

Mr and Mrs Alfred Tan

I find that vendors at computer fairs have to lower their prices as much as possible due to the competition from the other booths. I was very happy to find great bargains for the items I bought at the Techfest! I know I do not have to worry about support or maintenance for my purchases since the vendors all have established stores or online sites selling such products!

Children who lose their limbs are often given prosthetic ones as a replacement. However, what _____ a child could build and design his own Lego prosthetic arm?

(29)

It just got easier for children with prosthetic limbs to go fully bionic - with a little help from Lego. A new prosthetic arm dubbed IKO can be customised with Lego pieces so that a child can fashion his own Lego prosthetic arm. IKO is a creative prosthetic system designed _____ children to explore and empower their creativity in a playful, social and friendly way. IKO aims to give power back to the children who lost the function in one of their arms due to a congenital defect (present at birth), an accident, illness or wartime injury and help them gain back their confidence with _____ own self-designed arm.

The original concept for IKO came _____ Colombian Carlos Torres. He built a set of white plastic parts so that a child _____ easily swap a hand-like four-fingered claw for a digital spaceship. "My friends in psychology used to tell me that when a child has a disability, he is not really aware of it _____ he faces society," Torres said. Torres's design is geared _____ children between three and twelve years old, a broad age range covering crucial self-esteem-building years.

(32)

(34)

The field of prosthetics has seen significant advances in recent years. Designers _____ harnessed new technologies like 3-D printing to make prosthetics more beautiful, fashionable, or waterproof. People with prosthetic legs can often climb stairs, walk, swim, and run as though they are using natural limbs, while prosthetic arms and hands have advanced to the point _____ they give individual control of all five fingers.

Prosthetic limbs _____ among the world's truly great inventions. By boosting independence, they boost optimism and dramatically improve people's lives.

The education system in Japan plays a tremendous role in determining the fabric of (39)
Japanese society. Tradition, the Japanese place great emphasis on the concept of wa, or group harmony. The value of the universal good is more important than valuing one's own needs. This principle is applied in schools as seen in their efforts to help Japanese (40)
students grow up to be some of the most konsiencious citizens.

The schools are teaching children a simple lesson; how to clean up after themselves. The practice starts when students are in first grade and continues right through high school. "We did it because it was an obligecion," said Yumi Tagawa, who recalled cleaning duties such as sweeping the classrooms and the hallways, emptying trash cans, cleaning restrooms, cleaning chalkboards and chalk erasers and picking up trash from the school grounds.
(41)

Tagawa now works as a business development manager in the United States. She revealed that osoji was not a foreain idea until she moved to her present location.
(43) (44)
Tagawa's experience tapping into a national trend. Japan has no national mendate but numerous schools in the country require students to clean their schools daily.

The Japanese believe that if students are personally required to take care of their surroundings, they will waste less and treat their envairnement with more respect. The group cleaning also creates an equalising sense of purpose and community among those who (46)

participates.

(47)

When seeing their national soccer team being defeated during the 2014 World Cup, the Japanese fans showed others how to lose graciously. Armed with bin liners, they (48)
patrol their side of the stadium and gathered up discarded litter after the match. While gathering waste after a sporting event is customary in Japan, the spectators' actions came (49)

as a shock for football fans from other countries. It is evident that Japan's model teaches fundamenteil life skills which go far beyond Mathematics and Science. An approach that ignores this by focusing solely on "education" does its students a great disservice.

(50)

his family walked through the rain at his funeral.

I saw school children looking _____ despite wearing their ponchos.

Their faces were contorted by crying although it was impossible to see any tears through such heavy rain. Tens of thousands of regular Singaporeans, including children and the elderly, stood in the rain, some with inadequate umbrellas or ponchos, bareheaded and seemingly _____ to the rain. I was kicked hard in the shin while playing football in school. I was confined to bed for weeks afterwards and my mother proposed we go to Ganesh, a pundit, who had a gift of healing. It was a long drive to his house in Fountain Grove. It was a strange name. There was no fountain or water anywhere. For miles around, the land was flat, treeless and hot. Beharry's shop was the one sign of social life in the sad little village. It was a wooden building and the corrugated-iron roof was warped and rusted. Beharry lowered his newspaper and asked if it was the pundit we were looking for. Our taxi driver said sarcastically, "Nah. We come all the way just for the scenery."

Beharry was not prepared for this rudeness. "Look for the house which has a mango tree in the yard," he fumed.

10

Upon arrival, a young man came out to the verandah. He was a six-footer and I looked up at him in amazement. He was dressed in an ordinary way - trousers and vest. I did not think he looked particularly holy sans the *dhoti, koortah and turban that I had expected. I was slightly reassured when I saw that he was holding a big book.

15

As soon as we entered Ganesh's house, my mother's eyes widened in surprise, and even the taxi driver was fighting to control his astonishment. There were books galore. Books piled crazily on the table, books rising in mounds in the corners and books covering the floor. I stuttered, "How many books do you have, pundit?"

Leela, Ganesh's wife, replied, "Four hundred Everyman, two hundred Penguin, one hundred Reader's Library - make that seven hundred. I think the grand total should be about fifteen hundred good books here. My husband has read them all."

Ganesh started examining me. From time to time, he thumped my leg and I gave a great yelp of pain. When he was done, he rose and said, "Nothing's wrong with the boy. He just has a little bad blood. I shall prescribe something for him." He began mumbling a Hindi couplet over me.

25

My mother asked Ganesh in a querulous way, "You are sure there is nothing wrong? The foot looks very bad to me. ~~You must be a fake doctor.~~" Dissatisfaction gleamed in her eyes as her penetrating stare pierced through Ganesh.

Despite my mother's grumbling, I was ready to believe in him. I took the prescribed mixture from him and apologised for my mother's insensitive remark. Strangely, I held no ill-will against him. He had earned my utmost respect. In fact, the little man locked away with those fifteen hundred books in Fountain Grove had quashed my initial doubts about his medical abilities. He must have amassed a wealth of knowledge on medicine after reading all the books he had in his house.

A few days after taking the prescribed mixture, the swell went down and the pain ceased. A frown was sealed on my mother's forehead as she examined my shin carefully. She looked at me and muttered, "What sorcery is this? Your shin is completely healed after a few days. He is indeed a gifted healer."
