The Take

In Tanzania, the Maasai may lose their land - again

00:00 / 20:59

In the shadow of Serengeti National Park, some 70,000 people may soon lose the land that is their home. They're Maasai, an indigenous semi-nomadic people living alongside safari tours and game hunters. The Tanzanian government says an area where they live, Loliondo, is overpopulated and that it is threatening a precious ecosystem famed for its wild animals. It looks like a classic case of human vs animal – but the animals are also attractive to trophy hunters, and for the Maasai, the story goes much deeper.
