“Out loud thoughts” is an indie experimental album which explores the transition from more acoustic sounds to more processed sounds across the tracks. Being self-written and self-produced, the sonic choices relate to the compositions, reinforcing their meaning. Each of the songs represents an emotion. Their topics entail mental health, self-reflection and social critique.

Victòria Vilalta, who understands music as emotion and uses production to express the messages in her songs, expands her sound in this new album. With an experimental approach, as part of her master’s in Creative Music Production, she explored the effects of sound processing going beyond her essential acoustic sounds, finding new ways to express meaning in her tracks. Created in London, this album entails professional studio recordings and collaborations with other musicians.

In terms of songwriting, there’s also an evolution. Each of the songs still represents an emotion, as usual in Victoria Vilalta’s work, but they also entail values which are important to the writer and some of them have a social critique layer which is new.
