Tourism in the Conkouati-Douli National Park

Where the forest meets the ocean

The Conkouati-Douli National Park, created in 1999 in the southwest of the Republic of Congo, covers an area of 795,500 hectares.

The park is today recognized as a Ramsar site, and is included on the UNESCO World Heritage Tentative List.

This park is home to exceptional biodiversity, including 400 species of vertebrates, with emblematic species such as the forest elephant, the gorilla and around 7,000 chimpanzees.

The region, made up of beaches, mangroves, lagoons and forests, protects endangered species such as leatherback turtles, manatees, dolphins and humpback whales.

The Conkouati-Douli National Park aspires to become a model of sustainable and responsible tourism, focused on promoting its unique natural and cultural heritage.

By collaborating with local communities, the park aims to promote environmentally friendly activities, offering visitors full immersion in exceptional biodiversity while raising awareness of its conservation.

This development will strengthen its role as one of the most emblematic conservation sites in Central Africa.
