INTRODUCTION

Basics of Facility Management

For any business the Facility is very vital and critical as it encompasses infrastructure necessary for operation and enable organisation to deliver its products and services.

Every organization relies on a mix of functions and services to provide the support essential to its core business operations. Ensuring that this support is available in the right form, at the right quality and for the right cost is the task of facilities management (FM).

In essence, facility management encompasses multiple activities to ensure functionality of the existing environment by integrating people, place, process and technology.

The facilities management is a relatively new idea and in the past decade or so most organisations have started to think in strategic terms about non-core activities. At the beginning of the 21st century its climate of continuous change in business and technology, and due to the consequent emphasis on effective utilization of all corporate resources, facilities management has emerged as a very important business discipline. With this has come greater professionalism - and a wider range of choice in how specific functions and services are secured.

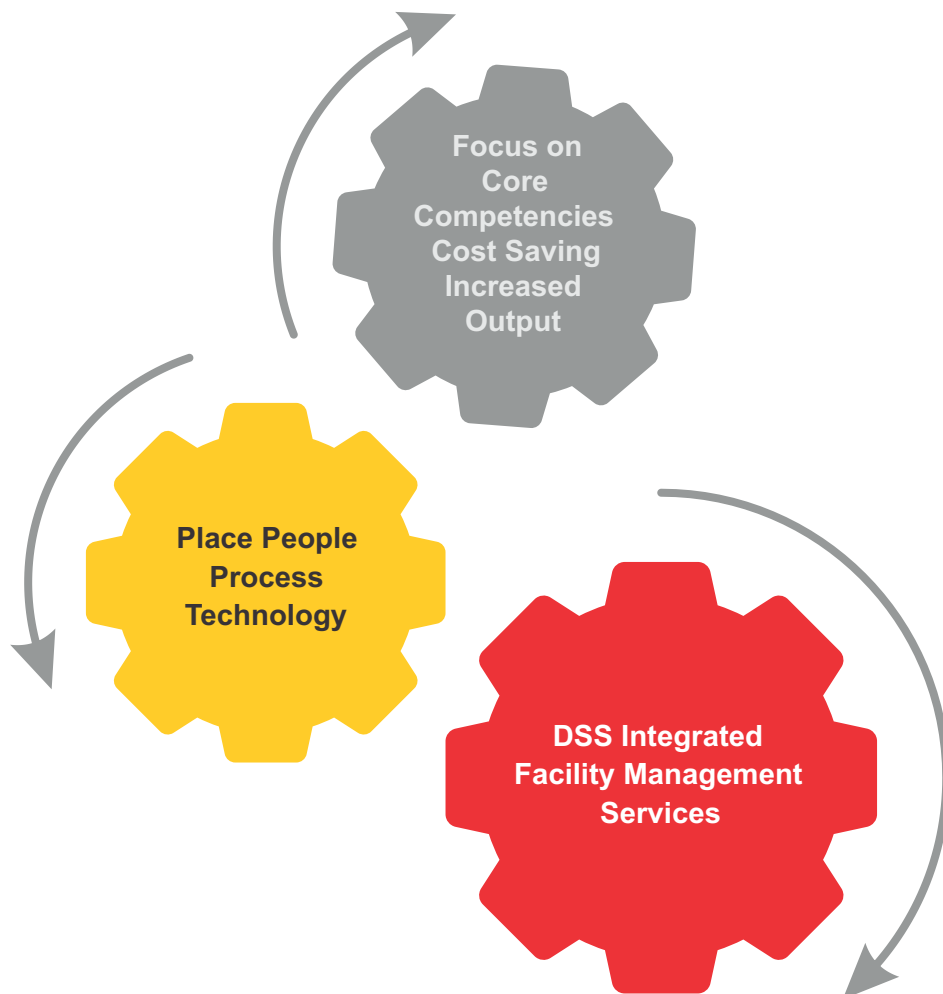

In current fast growing and globalised business environment, the Facility Management as a 'single stop' in integrated manner is becoming a common strategy for organisations with larger, complex facilities portfolios.
